Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors of Pack Liquidating, LLC v. Kepler Grp., LLC (In re Pack Liquidating, LLC)

United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Delaware

October 4, 2024, Decided

Case No. 22-10797, Adv. Proc. No. 23-50536

Reporter

2024 Bankr. LEXIS 2444 *

In re Pack Liquidating, LLC, et al.; Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors of Pack Liquidating, LLC, et al., derivatively on behalf of the Debtors' estates v. Kepler Group, LLC, et al.

Core Terms

funds, transfers, conduit, motion to dismiss, fraudulent conveyance, documents, argues, allegations, declaration, third-party, contends, affirmative defense, authentic, insolvent, courts

Case Summary

Overview

HOLDINGS: [1]- A committee of unsecured creditors' complaint under 11 U.S.C.S. § 550\(a\) did not allege facts that would establish that a debtor was a mere conduit. Evidence could be presented establishing that transferred funds went to a general bank operating account of the debtor where such funds were commingled with non-debtor funds. Under the case law, that would suggest that the debtor was not a mere conduit; [2]- The complaint adequately alleged, in the alternative to its preference claim, a claim for fraudulent conveyance under 11 U.S.C.S. § 548. The complaint generally alleged that the debtors were insolvent, had insufficient liquidity to funds their operations, and were incurring debts beyond their availability to pay at the time of the transfers.

Outcome

Debtor's motion to dismiss denied.

HN1 Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

At the motion to dismiss stage, the court must determine whether the complaint's factual allegations, along with any attached exhibits, are sufficient to state the claims alleged. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure require only a short plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8\(a\)\(2\). Fed. R. Civ. P. 9 requires particularity when the plaintiff alleges fraud or mistake, but intent and knowledge may be alleged generally. The purpose is to place defendants fairly on notice of the conduct alleged to give rise to the cause of action at issue.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN2 Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

The Third Circuit has set forth a two-step analysis to evaluate a motion to dismiss. First, courts should separate the factual and legal elements of a claim, accepting only the well-pled facts as true while disregarding any legal conclusions. And second, courts should determine whether the facts alleged, assuming them to be true, give rise to a plausible claim for relief.

HN3 Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

Generally, on a motion to dismiss, courts must limit their consideration to matters contained within the four corners of a complaint, including materials attached thereto. There is, however, an exception that permits the consideration of a document that is either integral to or explicitly relied upon in the complaint. In addition, those documents must be "undisputedly authentic" and attached as an exhibit to the motion to dismiss if the plaintiff's claims are based on that document.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Motions for Summary Judgment > Notice Requirement

HN4 Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

The exception to the principle that a motion to dismiss should be premised on the allegations of the complaint and materials attached thereto is a narrow one. Extraneous documents may be considered only when they are indisputably authentic. To find otherwise would risk bumping up against Fed. R. Civ. P. 12\(d\), which provides that reliance on material outside the pleadings generally requires a court to treat the motion as one for summary judgment under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12\(d\).

HN5 Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A motion to dismiss measures the allegations set forth in the complaint against the elements of a plaintiff's prima facie case. The availability of a potential affirmative defense is not generally cognizable on a motion to dismiss. There is an exception, however, where the availability of the affirmative defense is apparent based on the plaintiff's own factual allegations.

Bankruptcy Law > Estate Property > Avoidance > Transferee Liabilities & Rights

HN6  Avoidance, Transferee Liabilities & Rights

11 U.S.C.S. § 550\(a\) enables the trustee to recover transfers avoided under 11 U.S.C.S. §§ 547 and 548 from the initial transferee of such transfers, the entity for whose benefit such transfers were made, or any subsequent transferee. 11 U.S.C.S. § 550\(a\)\(1\)-\(2\). A defense to such recovery is available, however, for parties who act as a mere conduit in receiving a transfer solely for another and not for their own benefit. A party that is a "mere conduit" is not a transferee from whom the trustee may recover transferred property under § 550.

Bankruptcy Law > Estate Property > Avoidance > Transferee Liabilities & Rights

HN7  Avoidance, Transferee Liabilities & Rights

In the context of 11 U.S.C.S. § 550, to be a "mere conduit," a defendant must establish that it lacked dominion and control over the transfer because the payment simply passed through its hands and it had no power to redirect the funds to its own use. Where a transferee is not under any contractual or other obligation to use transferred funds for the benefit of third parties, but rather, may use the funds freely, it is not a mere conduit.

Bankruptcy Law > ... > Preferential Transfers > Elements > Benefit of Creditor

HN8  Elements, Benefit of Creditor

In the context of 11 U.S.C.S. § 550, in examining whether a recipient of funds is a mere conduit, courts examine the sequence of payments between the debtor, defendant, and third-party. For example, where the debtor reimburses the defendant for the defendant's advance payment to a third-party, but the defendant is not under any obligation to use the transfers for the benefit of the claimants' the defendant is the owner of the funds it receives, and thus is not a mere conduit.

Bankruptcy Law > Estate Property > Avoidance > Transferee Liabilities & Rights

HN9  Avoidance, Transferee Liabilities & Rights

In the context of 11 U.S.C.S. § 550, to be a conduit, one cannot be a creditor and receive a payment to satisfy a debt—this is the hallmark of a preferential transfer. And that principle remains true even where a debtor imposes an obligation on the defendant to pass along funds to a third-party. Instead, a true conduit's obligation to the transferee would not arise until the transferor paid the conduit and the amount of the obligation would depend on the amount the transferor paid to the conduit.

Dear Counsel:

The debtors in this bankruptcy case operated an e-commerce business as thirdparty sellers of health, beauty, and other consumer products on online marketplaces.<sup>1</sup> The debtors filed their chapter 11 petitions in August 2022. The Committee filed this adversary proceeding seeking to avoid, as preferences and/or as fraudulent conveyances, $409,044.05 in payments that the debtors allegedly made to or for the benefit of the defendants in the 90 days before the bankruptcy filing.<sup>2</sup>

One of the defendants, Kepler, has moved to dismiss.<sup>3</sup> Kepler's principal argument is that $389,108.09 in payments are [*14] not recoverable as a matter of law because Kepler was not the "initial transferee," as defined by § 550 of the Bankruptcy Code, of the transfers in that amount. Instead, Kepler contends that it was a "mere conduit." Kepler also contends that the fraudulent conveyance claim fails because the complaint does not assert that the debtors received less than reasonably equivalent value in exchange for the transfers. Additionally, Kepler argues that the complaint fails to allege facts that would establish that the debtors were insolvent at the date of, or became insolvent as a result of, the transfers. Both the Committee and Amazon filed oppositions to Kepler's motion to dismiss, arguing that the affirmative defense of a mere conduit is premature at the pleading stage of this case.<sup>4</sup>

The Court concludes that the complaint, on its face, does not allege Kepler was a mere conduit. The Court will accordingly deny the motion to dismiss.

Factual and Procedural Background

Kepler is an e-marketing services provider that licenses and installs Amazon advertising platforms for its customers. The complaint alleges that Kepler purchased advertising campaigns from Amazon as an agent of the debtors. Amazon would bill Kepler each month [*15] for the services that Amazon provided to the debtors. Kepler, in turn, billed the debtors for the amount of Amazon's invoices, plus a fee for Kepler's services. The complaint further alleges that Kepler would then pay the Amazon invoices after it received payment from the debtors.

Jurisdiction

The Committee asserted claims to avoid and recover preferential transfers and fraudulent conveyances. These claims arise under the Bankruptcy Code \(§§ 547, 548, and 550\) and are thus within the district court's "arising under" jurisdiction as set out in 11 U.S.C. § 1334(b). These cases have been referred to this Court under 28 U.S.C. § 157\(a\) and the February 29, 2012 Standing Order of Reference of the United States District Court for the District of Delaware.

Analysis

At the motion to dismiss stage, the Court must determine whether the complaint's factual allegations, along with any attached exhibits, are sufficient to state the claims alleged. HN1 [↑] The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure require only a "short plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief."<sup>5</sup> Rule 9 requires particularity

when the plaintiff alleges fraud or mistake, but intent and knowledge may be alleged generally.<sup>6</sup> The purpose is to place defendants fairly on notice of the conduct [*16] alleged to give rise to the cause of action at issue.<sup>7</sup>

HN2↑] The Third Circuit has set forth a two-step analysis to evaluate a motion to dismiss. First, courts should separate the factual and legal elements of a claim, accepting only the well-pled facts as true while disregarding any legal conclusions. And second, courts should determine whether the facts alleged, assuming them to be true, give rise to a plausible claim for relief.<sup>8</sup>

HN3↑] Generally, on a motion to dismiss, courts must limit their consideration to matters contained within the four corners of a complaint, including materials attached thereto.<sup>9</sup> There is, however, an exception that permits the consideration of a document that is either integral to or explicitly relied upon in the complaint.<sup>10</sup> In addition, those documents must be "undisputedly authentic" and attached as an exhibit to the motion to dismiss if the plaintiff's claims are based on that document.<sup>11</sup>

Kepler appended to its motion to dismiss a declaration signed by its counsel that purported to authenticate certain documents that were not attached to the complaint.<sup>12</sup> The Committee responds by objecting to that declaration, observing that it is not clear from the declaration that [*17] the declarant has personal knowledge of the documents.<sup>13</sup> While the Committee's objection does not expressly challenge the authenticity of the documents, the point of the objection is that the attached documents themselves raise questions (including, perhaps, questions of authenticity) that the Committee has not had the opportunity to explore. HN4↑] The exception to the principle that a motion to dismiss should be premised on the allegations of the complaint and materials attached thereto, recognized in White Consolidated Industries, is a narrow one. Extraneous documents may be considered only when they are indisputably authentic. To find otherwise would risk bumping up against Rule 12(d), which provides that reliance on material outside the pleadings generally requires a court to treat the motion as one for summary judgment under Rule 56.<sup>14</sup> The Court will accordingly limit its consideration to the matters set forth in the complaint itself.

I. The complaint does not on its face plead facts that establish the affirmative defense of mere conduit.

measures the allegations set forth in the complaint against the elements of a plaintiff's prima facie case. The availability of a potential affirmative defense is not generally cognizable on a motion to dismiss.<sup>15</sup> There is an exception, however, where the availability of the affirmative defense is apparent based on the plaintiff's own factual allegations.<sup>16</sup>

HN6<sup>15</sup> Section 550\(a\) enables the trustee to recover transfers avoided under §§ 547 and 548 from the initial transferee of such transfers, the entity for whose benefit such transfers were made, or any subsequent transferee.<sup>17</sup> A defense to such recovery is available, however, for "parties who act as a mere conduit in receiving a transfer solely for another and not for their own benefit."<sup>18</sup> A party that is a "mere conduit" is not a transferee from whom the trustee may recover transferred property under § 550.<sup>19</sup>

HN7<sup>16</sup> "To be a 'mere conduit,' a defendant must establish that it lacked dominion and control over the transfer because the payment simply passed through its hands and it had no power to redirect the funds to its own use."<sup>20</sup> "Where a transferee is 'not under any contractual or other obligation to use [transferred funds] for the benefit [*19] of [third parties,]' but rather, may use the funds freely, it is not a 'mere conduit.'"<sup>21</sup>

HN8<sup>17</sup> In examining whether a recipient of funds is a mere conduit, courts examine the sequence of payments between the debtor, defendant, and third-party. For example, "where the debtor reimburses the defendant for the defendant's advance payment to a third-party," but the "defendant is 'not under any obligation to use the transfers for the benefit of the claimants'" the defendant is the "owner" of the funds it receives, and thus is not a mere conduit.<sup>22</sup>

HN9<sup>18</sup> "Courts have made it clear that to be a conduit, one cannot be a creditor and receive a payment to satisfy a debt—this is the 'hallmark' of a preferential transfer."<sup>23</sup> And that principle "remains true even where a debtor imposes an obligation on the defendant to pass along funds to a third-party."<sup>24</sup> Instead, "a true conduit's obligation to the transferee would not arise until the transferor paid the conduit and the amount of the obligation would depend on the amount the transferor paid to the conduit."<sup>25</sup>

Kepler argues that the sequence of payments between itself, the debtors, and Amazon shows that it was a mere conduit of the funds. Kepler contends that unlike scenarios [*20] in which the debtor reimburses a defendant for an advanced payment, Kepler's obligation to pay Amazon did not arise unless and until the debtors paid Kepler the amounts owed to Amazon. Kepler further argues that its obligation to Amazon depended on the amount it received from the debtors. In support of those propositions, however, Kepler relies on the Amazon ad agreements and the advertising service agreement with the debtors, both of which were attached to the declarations.

In response to Kepler's motion to dismiss, the Committee contends that Kepler's status as a mere conduit requires a fact-intensive analysis regarding the extent of Kepler's dominion and control over the transfers. And that analysis includes an examination of the manner in which Kepler received and held the transfers, the bank accounts in which the funds were deposited, and Kepler's rights and uses of those accounts. The Committee argues that it is not obligated to disprove the affirmative defense of "mere conduit" at the pleadings stage of this litigation and that it has not yet had the opportunity to obtain the necessary discovery to address the defense. The Committee argues that even if the Court were to consider [*21] the exhibits attached to Kepler's declaration, those documents show that the payments came from a Kepler general operating account that commingled the transferred funds with non-debtor receipts.

Amazon's opposition to Kepler's motion to dismiss also asserts that the transferred funds were commingled in Kepler's bank account, illustrating its dominion and control over the transfers. Amazon argues that there is no evidence that Kepler used the same funds that it received from the debtors to pay Amazon because Kepler deposited the funds into a general operating account that it used to pay Amazon. That bank account was allegedly controlled by Kepler and was in Kepler's own name. Amazon further contends that Kepler had both the discretion to decide how much to pay Amazon and when to pay Amazon. Both Amazon and the Committee point to caselaw that holds that a vendor is not a "mere conduit" where it accepts payments into its general operating account, thereby commingling the fund received with its other funds, even if the vendor transfers a portion of the funds to a third-party.

In In re U.S. Interactive, Inc., the defendant was a travel agency that forwarded the debtors' transferred funds [*22] to hotels and airlines on behalf of the debtors.<sup>26</sup> The court held that the defendant retained dominion and control over the transferred funds because the money went into a general operating account from which a variety of parties could be paid.<sup>27</sup> The court reasoned that the defendant had "the power to decide who to pay with the funds received from the Debtors, including the Defendant's own creditors."<sup>28</sup> Because the defendant had the ability to decide who to pay, it was not a mere conduit.

Additionally, in In re AES Thames, the defendant argued it was acting as an agent and mere conduit when accepting payments from the debtor for third-parties.<sup>29</sup> The court focused on the following facts in determining that the defendant exercised dominion and control over the transferred funds: (1) the defendant's "bank account was maintained solely in its name"; (2) it "deposited funds into its account from sources other than the Debtor"; and (3) the defendant had no obligation to "segregate funds, hold funds in escrow or hold funds in trust that it received from the Debtor for the benefit of any third parties."<sup>30</sup> There, the court found that the defendant was "free to do what it pleased with the proceeds" [*23] from the debtor, despite the fact that the defendant "chose to pay a portion of the proceeds to [third-parties]."<sup>31</sup>

Here, the complaint does not allege facts that would establish that Kepler was a mere conduit. And even if the Court were to consider the attached documents, those documents on their face establish only that Kepler's obligation to pay Amazon did not arise until the debtors paid Kepler amounts owed to Amazon. That is not by itself sufficient to establish the defense. Evidence may still be presented establishing that the transferred funds went to a general Kepler bank operating account where such funds were commingled with non-debtor funds. Under the case law, that would suggest that Kepler was not a mere conduit.

Accordingly, the Court is satisfied that this is not one of those cases in which the complaint itself operates to plead the plaintiff out of court by alleging facts that show the availability of an affirmative defense. The Court will deny the motion to dismiss.

II. The complaint adequately alleges, in the alternative to its preference claim, a claim for fraudulent conveyance under § 548.

Kepler argues that the fraudulent conveyance claim fails because the complaint [*24] does not assert that the debtors received less than reasonably equivalent value in exchange for the transfers. Kepler also contends that the complaint fails to show that the debtors were insolvent at the time of, or became insolvent as a result of, the transfers at issue. In response, the Committee argues that the complaint asserts the fraudulent conveyance claim as an alternative theory to the preference claim. The Committee contends that the fraudulent conveyance claim operates to preserve the Committee's ability to pursue a fraudulent conveyance theory if it were to turn out that, contrary to the allegations in their preference count, one or more transfers were not made on account of antecedent debt (since the satisfaction of a valid debt would constitute reasonably equivalent value).

The complaint does generally allege that the debtors were insolvent, had insufficient liquidity to funds their operations, and were incurring debts beyond their availability to pay at the time of the transfers. The complaint incorporates by reference the declaration of Brian Teets in support of the chapter 11 petitions and first day motions that sets forth such facts.<sup>32</sup>

Kepler is likely correct that a [*25] transaction cannot give rise to both claims for preference and constructive fraudulent conveyance. The element of a preference that the payment be in satisfaction of an antecedent debt would likely by itself establish reasonably equivalent value, and thus defeat a claim for constructive fraudulent conveyance. But the Committee is right that it is entitled to assert those claims in the alternative. The motion to dismiss the fraudulent conveyance claim will therefore also be denied.

Conclusion

For the reasons set forth above, the Court will deny Kepler's motion to dismiss. The Court will issue a separate order so providing.
